Abstract

Abstract Violence and inequalities suffered by Central American women force them to migrate in search of better opportunities. As has begun, they are exposed to greater violence because of their gender. Migrants, particularly mestizo, women and, sometimes, minors. The journey space in which Central Americans, particularly women, are exposed to violence by criminals. Orderly and regular mobility would protect them from the to which they are exposed; to this end, migration governance is needed. This approach with intersectionality as a theoretical approach and the methodology used was based on interviews and a bibliographic review.
